New research shows that exposure to stressful life events and stress-related symptoms, such as a reduced concentration or depression, are strongly associated with breast cancer risk. The study was published in the journal Cancer Prevention Research. "When we were in elementary school, we learned to avoid stress because it can be harmful. Yet, it is not surprising that stress is one of the highest risk factors for cancer development," says Dr. Andrew Thurtell from the University of Wollongong, Australia. He is lead author on the study, which can be found in the journal Cancer Prevention Research. "The good news is that our findings indicate that stress-related cancer risk factors, like prolonged or multiple exposures to stress, can be avoided. In other words, through various lifestyle practices, such as exercise and sleeping well, we can reduce the effect of stress on our body," says Thurtell. The study involved a total of 2,955 women who were enrolled in the Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health. All of them were 18-45 years old when the survey was conducted between 2000 and 2013. The women answered questions about their lifestyle and stress levels, including their sleep patterns. The researchers linked the information they provided to what lifestyle factors they had at the time of the interview. "Both body-to-mind connections, such as certain foods, and mind-to-mind connections, such as meditation, were found to lower risk of cancer. For example, we found that women who did meditation and practiced mindfulness had half the risk of breast cancer as non-practitioners. Additionally, we found that women with insomnia had a risk for breast cancer that was higher than women who did not experience insomnia," says Thurtell. "To sum up, our study highlights the importance of a healthy lifestyle to reduce stress-related cancer risk factors," he concludes.
